...Well, there's a war and a lake*.

The Conquest of Naples by Charles of Durazzo, 1381–82

“Painted in Florence about 1400, this elaborately decorated front of a chest (cassone) recounts in three episodes the conquest of Naples by Charles III of Durazzo, who defeated the forces of Otto of Brunswick in 1381. At the right, the armies clash; in the center, Otto's troops (recognizable by their distinctive haircut) surrender to Charles; at the left, the victors enter the conquered city. The prominent pennants and coats of arms in the spandrels are those of the Durazzo and the kings of Hungary.” Left unmentioned: popes, anti-popes, schisms, excommunications, dynastic squabbling that often only ended with a lack of viable offspring, and several assassinations. Ruling Naples was apparently not for the timid.

I wait with breathless anticipation for the first attempts to seriously add naval combat to the SCA's list of martial activities. You say that this will never happen? HA! Ha, I say. I remember when the same thing was said about adding horsemanship in any form. ...The Chronicler will now leave this footnote in some haste, as he has just had the sudden anagnorisis that he is now one of those people who has been in the Society for going on three decades now.*

Exeunt, being chased by the Bearonage.*
